The internet never forgets! Digital technology has become an inevitable part of our day to day life. A large amount of personal information is being stored in the virtual world for a long span of time. This has changed the tradition from “forgetting as default” in case of humans to “remembering by default” after the advent of technology. Thus, the never-ending collusion between Freedom of Expression and Privacy still continues to haunt the legislators. Apart from this a new intervention between journalism and technology also has to be looked into. This paper aims to analyse how the nations are trying to implement the Right to be Forgotten by striking a balance between the Freedom of Expression and Privacy and also the intervention between journalism and technology.
